What people produced the Mycenaean civilization is the most important problem in archaic Greek history<sup>1</sup>. Any attempt to solve it must be conducted with extreme caution and freedom from dogmatism. It is evident from the wide diffusion of their remains that the race which produced these works was one which must have possessed in its time great political power around the basin of the eastern Mediterranean. Such a race can hardly have perished without leaving some echo of its deeds behind, for in some parts of the area which they once occupied, as in Attica at the tomb of Menidi, there seems to be evidence that there has been no break in the continuity of the local worship and local art of pottery from the Mycenaean age proper down to the Attic red-figured vases. The Greeks above all other people have left to us copious traditions respecting the early history of their land, its first occupiers, their inter-relations, and their racial divisions. As we find an unbroken continuity in the history of the pottery produced in Attica,...
